

Impact of peace and terrorism on pakistan

Peace, a 5 letter and single syllable word, so easy to utter yet too complex to attain. Especially a third world country like ours has forever been zoning in and out of it, but the effort to achieve it, continues.

Peace for any individual or a nation could have many definitions, for some it could mean freedom of expression, maintenance of civil rights and for some it could mean to put a stop to the seemingly endless misery in the form of violence coming from the higher nations, yemen, syria, palestine and kashmir being few of the many heart wrenching yet true examples

Terrorism on the other hand, could easily be taken as the opposite of peace, but is it really? Terrorism could mean disruption of peace, but it could also mean disobedience against legislations and constitutions, which dont necessarily facilitate discontinuity of peace, atleast not immediately, but still come under the definition of terrorism.

Islamic Republic of Pakistan has had experiences of both these antonyms. It has witnessed establishment of beneficial international relations with super powers like China and USA which helped build supportive structures like CPAC and US-AID which supposedly benefit the general public and at the same time it has been unfortunate enough to witness loads of civil unrest, injustices to minorities being one of the major reasons to have caused it.

In the debate of peace and terrorism, our goal as a nation shall be to move further towards the former and away from the latter, as impractical it may sound to some, it's never impossible and always achievable inshallah.
